

Page access brings both joy and sorrow

Normally, one would expect a lot of traffic to their own or their company's website, and if that happens, they would be overjoyed. However, in the case of my webpage... because I don't have a credit card and I have no financial leeway, if there is too much traffic, the page becomes inaccessible. This leads to the title above:

"Joy and Sorrow with Page Access."

This is the title.

By the way...it's not just a matter of 3 million yen...

*However, I can say this:

(Stage 1)

If you have money to spare, consider hiring someone else

Decide to give up. Otherwise, proceed to Stage 2.

(Stage 2)

The idea of asking a skilled acquaintance to do it

Decision to give up. Otherwise, proceed to Stage 3.

This also includes the idea of doing it as a token of appreciation to an acquaintance, even though there is insufficient budget for creation.

(Stage 3)

Since there is neither money nor a skilled acquaintance, create it yourself.

If the result is failure due to giving up halfway through, then learn and practice through trial and error.

Whether you succeed or fail in the third stage, this experience will be invaluable for your future life, and I can say this with certainty because I have experienced and put it into practice myself. I previously published

"You can turn a crisis into a great opportunity yourself."

And if, by any chance, you do join a company, make sure you not only learn your own responsibilities but also strive to learn the work of all departments, and ultimately maintain the ability to handle all departments.

That's all.
